There's a negative social stigma attached to rehab and the whole procedure involved when you attend a facility to recover. Many of the misconceptions are often fueled by the inaccurate portrayal of rehabs by the media.

Rehab is not an experience many of us have or will go through; rehab procedures' 'unknown' nature is often treated with fear. The fear eventually fuels the inaccurate depictions of the rehab recovery process. These misconceptions are the primary reasons most people who need help never seek it.

Thankfully, there is now an increasing awareness of the mindful and holistic techniques used in rehab facilities to help their patients successfully. Let's take a look at rehab misconceptions that may be holding you back from checking into a rehab center in California.

1. Rehab Is for the Wealthy

The media is significantly responsible for this common misconception. Celebrities are often shown checking into luxurious rehab facilities that are seemingly only accessible to well-off patients or high-profile people.

As much as such luxurious rehabs exist, there are many other kinds of rehab centers. Rehab clinics are more affordable than most people assume.

The other misconception that intertwines with this one is that the more expensive the center is, the better the care. There are multiple affordable rehab centers in California with reasonable charges and exceptional support and maintenance, one of which is The Edge Treatment.

2. I Have to Be Addicted to Hardcore Drugs to Go to Rehab

Another dangerously common misconception is that you have to be a hardcore drug user or a severe alcoholic that's in danger of dying from their abuse to qualify for rehab.

Starting your rehab journey is the best step you can ever make. Granted, if this is your first time, you’re likely unaware of what to expect, and it’s absolutely normal. For others, informing their friends and family that they are planning to check into a rehab facility is also a challenging bridge to cross.

Feeling stressed about the forthcoming process and putting your engagements on hold is absolutely normal. However, there are ways to mitigate these worries by preparing yourself for addiction treatment.

So, you have scheduled your check-in date in a rehab center in California, and suddenly you don’t know where to start your preparation for that. Don’t worry because we have you covered.

Check out these essential steps to take in preparation. If you need further information, you can learn more at The Edge Treatment.

1. Determine Which Rehab Center in California Is Right for You

Making the decision to seek out treatment is often the first step to recovery. There are plenty of rehab facilities that offer drug rehabilitation services to people suffering from substance abuse disorder.

1. Highly Qualified Staff

Drug and alcohol treatment centers like The Edge Treatment may have specific addictions that they specialize in. Some may solely deal with alcohol or a particular drug, and others specialize in dual diagnosis, which involves treating a drug and alcohol addiction that co-occurs with a mental illness.

When looking for a suitable drug and alcohol treatment center, try and ask if they specialize in their specific type of addiction. Their experience and past success in dealing with your kind of addiction will help determine if it is the right treatment center for you.

2. Resources at the Facility

A good drug and alcohol treatment center should have all the resources required, both staff and amenities, for a successful treatment outcome.

The amenities at the facility should be at least basic yet fully functional. However, other facilities may have upgraded amenities as long as they're effective. The goal is to have a dignified and respectful environment for addiction patients.

3. Involvement of Family and or Loved Ones

For more sustainable treatment results, a drug and alcohol treatment center involving the family and or loved ones in the patient's treatment has a higher chance of success. The family can help the patient maintain the treatment gains after the treatment process and develop more productive coping habits such as picking up a new hobby or workout activity.

4 Important Factors to Consider When Choosing a Drug And Alcohol Treatment Center

Once you realize you are dependent on a particular drug or alcohol, seeking professional help would be an excellent decision. Most people struggling with drugs and alcohol addiction take long to accept that they have a problem and need medical attention.

When you start searching for drug or alcohol treatment centers, you will probably come across so many, all of them claiming to be the best of the best. However, there are plenty of factors to consider when looking for a drug alcohol treatment center. Check out these four essential factors to consider when choosing a drug and alcohol treatment center.

Does It Meet Your Needs

There are numerous treatments offered in most drug and alcohol treatment centers. They include inpatient care, outpatient care, or a combination of both. You might need a professional evaluation to help you determine the nature and severity of your condition to help you decide on the type of treatment best for you.

If you already know the type of treatment you are looking for, search for facilities that offer such services. You can search online, ask for referrals from family and friends, or visit the drug alcohol treatment center like The Edge Treatment in person. You can also call some rehab centers if you need additional information about their services.

The thought of going to a residential rehab center is devastating to both the patient and the family. Most inpatient addiction treatment programs last about thirty days. Before setting out for the rehab, the patient is psychologically prepared to expect during the residential stay. The preparation includes what to bring and what not to bring to the center.

The tricky part is when a parent has to prepare a teenager to go to inpatient rehab. With the knowledge of what is expected of you, packing becomes easy, except when teenagers insist on bringing illegal items. Here are a few things you are allowed to carry to a drug rehab center like The Edge Treatment.

A Journal Is Allowed

During your stay in an inpatient drug rehab center, most of your time will be occupied with therapies and other group activities. However, you will still have some time to yourself between the sessions. Sitting idle during the treatment period can trigger your mind to relapse.

Therefore, experts recommend bringing a book or a journal to keep yourself busy during your free moments. Such activities work perfectly to occupy the mind, help reduce stress and anxiety, and assist in dealing with depression.

Inpatient vs. Outpatient: Which one is right for you?

By Peter - February 3, 2022

19.4% of people have used illicit drugs at least once in their lifetime. If regulated drugs are added to the statistics, such as alcohol and cigarettes, it jumps to 60.2 % of Americans who have used a drug at least once.

The National Centre for Drug Abuse statistics (NCDAS) further reports more than seven hundred thousand deaths through drug abuse. The federal government in 2020 alone set aside $35 billion on drug control, but it still is not enough.

This is because peers and the media often influence drug abuse. While drug abuse problems persist, many seek help through licensed drug rehab centers like The Edge Treatment across the U.S.

The first step to overcoming drugs or alcohol addiction is accepting that you have a problem and need help. Once you decide to get professional assistance to regain your sobriety, the next thing is to find out the best options for you.

Outpatient rehab is the best option if you wish to continue living your everyday life with family and friends. However, your therapist will help you choose a suitable program after an assessment to determine the nature and severity of your condition. The two primary types of patients in healthcare, in general, are inpatient and outpatient. In rehab, inpatients live in a rehab facility full time as they get their treatment while outpatients attend to their rehab treatment during the day and leave the facility once their program for the day is over.

An in-patient rehab facility is generally a non-hospital setting that provides recovering addicts with a community of support. The patients can typically have a long-term or short-term residential stay ranging from a month to a year, depending on the severity of their addiction.

While inpatient rehab treatment has various benefits, it's not always appropriate for everyone. Here's a guide to help you discover whether this is the right drug and alcohol rehab treatment for you or your loved one, or you can visit the site to see more.

Drug addiction is a chronic disease that cannot be cured by simply putting a stop to the drug use. It requires a treatment process that works to help the victim not just stop using drugs but be able to live drug-free, and become a productive member of society.

The first step to recovery is the drug addict acknowledging that their drug use has a negative impact on their quality of life. After this is when the rehabilitation process can begin.

There are several approaches to drug addiction treatment plans but all contain similar components that have proven successful over the years.

Learn more is a breakdown of the steps you can expect from a comprehensive drug addiction treatment plan.

1. Detoxification of Drugs

The initial step of any process of drug addiction treatment is removal of the substance from the victim's body. This process also involves managing the withdrawal symptoms that may be caused by the process of detoxification.

In some cases, the detox process will require medical assistance to safely manage the withdrawal symptoms.

Planning an Intervention to Help a Loved One Battle Drug Addiction? Here Are the Steps To Take

February 4, 2022 by enaamari

Helping a loved one overcome addiction can sometimes be a nightmare, especially if the individual does not acknowledge the problem. A simple one-on-one but friendly conversation can be an excellent kick-off to recovery. However, if the addiction advances and the victim still does not see the problem, it would necessitate a more focused approach. You may consider joining hands with a team to pursue an intervention.

People struggle with various types of addictions, including alcoholism, compulsive gambling, compulsive eating, and street drug abuse. This step-by-step guide will help you learn more about intervening with your loved one battling addiction to take drug addiction treatment.

Make a Plan

A close family or friend concerned about the wellbeing of the addiction patient suggests intervention and creates a group of people to plan. The individual may feel betrayed and resentful towards the planner, hence refusing to seek drug addiction treatment. The intervention is a challenging course that can result in danger if you are not careful.

A large population of the world today is fighting dual-diagnosis, which tends to affect the vulnerable population. Dual-diagnosis patients suffer from both mental disorders and substance abuse. An example is individuals battling alcohol addiction and depression, or simultaneously drug abuse and personality disorder.

The main challenge is the financial implication related to dual-diagnosis, which hinders the majority of the patients from accessing the treatment. As a result, some experts suggest that governments should chip in to support the individuals who cannot access the necessities of dual diagnosis. However, it is essential to understand more about the condition. Here are some facts you need to know that may make your check-in at a dual diagnosis treatment center like The Edge Treatment.

The majority of the people battling addiction also have an underlying mental disorder; dual diagnosis disorder. Most of them suffer from conditions like major depression, anxiety, and trauma. However, the challenge is that some of them do not recognize that they have another problem besides addiction, hence seeking only treatment for what they know. The existence of both conditions simultaneously is known as a co-occurring disorder.

The good news is that dual diagnosis disorder treatment centers can help treat the underlying condition and the addiction problem. If you doubt your situation, it will help to seek an assessment before starting treatment. Take a look at some benefits you can get from a dual diagnosis treatment center like The Edge Treatment for substance abuse.

Identifying the Underlying Cause

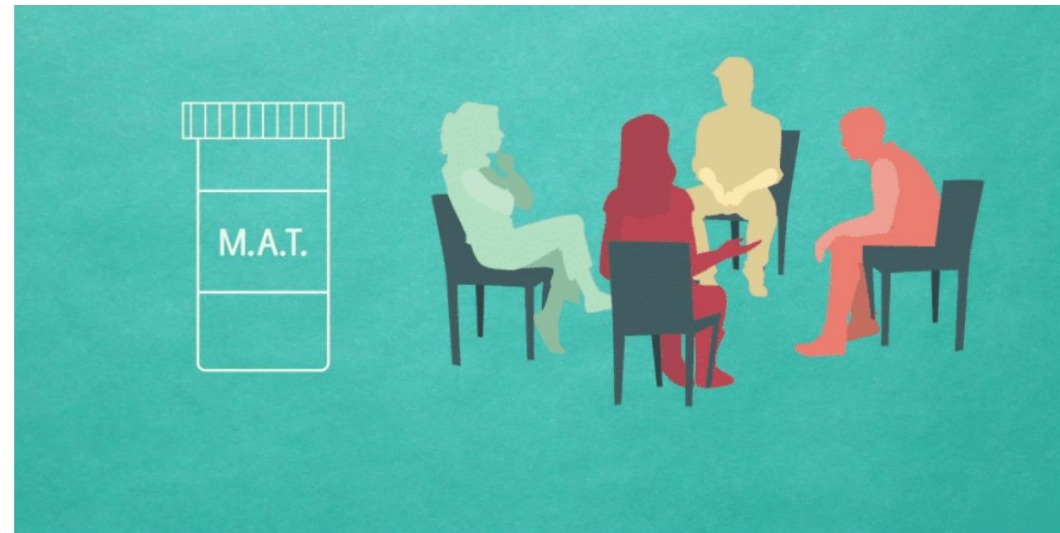

The first step you will undergo in a dual diagnosis treatment center is a detailed assessment to determine the underlying cause of substance use. It could be trauma, grief, stress, family history, or battling some negative emotions. Some individuals turn to drug use such as alcohol to help them cope with mental disorders like major depression, anxiety, bipolar, and other conditions.

When individuals start using drugs, they do not think of addiction until it happens. A dual diagnosis therapist will dig to get to the root cause of addiction then begin treatment.

Helps Change Thought Process

A dual diagnosis treatment center aims to help patients deal with issues instead of seeking drugs. A therapist will guide you through a process of changing your thoughts and behaviors, learning to work out solutions, and achieving your goals without involving any substance.

Opioid use is at an all-time high. People who get hooked on opioids usually begin by getting a prescription from a doctor for chronic pain. However, as time progresses, they rely increasingly on the medication. Therefore, going “cold turkey” proves dangerous, and medical intervention is necessary.

To respond to an opioid user’s treatment needs, Medical Assisted Treatment (MAT) programs have been set up to help opioid users overcome their addiction to the highly addictive pain medicine.

If you’re looking for opioid treatment programs, you can see more here.

Therefore, it is crucial to find a suitable rehab program for yourself or your loved one battling opioid use disorder. See more these factors when choosing an excellent opioid treatment program.

Does the Facility Match Your Needs?

Before you start searching for a rehab center, visit a doctor for an assessment to determine your needs. You can be assessed by a psychiatrist, medical doctor, or any professional with experience in opioid disorder and other related treatments. It will determine the type of opioid treatment programs you need; residential or outpatient.

After the assessment, look for a facility with the resources that meet your individual needs. Some opioid patients have other underlying conditions such as depression or anxiety, requiring dual-diagnosis treatment. Ensure that the rehab center has adequate staff and apply the treatment approaches that suit you.

The choice between inpatient and outpatient rehab mainly depends on the severity of addiction to drugs or alcohol.

Outpatient treatment is an option that patients with less severe addiction can explore. But even then, it is not a guarantee that outpatient rehab will work for patients with less severe addiction because the success of the treatment varies from one person to another. Some may need to undergo inpatient treatment, but outpatient rehab works just fine for most.

The most important factor to consider is the quality of care that the facility provides. Here are some practical benefits of outpatient drug rehab that you should consider when choosing for you or a loved one, or you can click here to visit this site.

1. Fits into Work and Family Schedule

Outpatient drug rehab gives you control over how often and when you need to go to the treatment facilities.

Some outpatient drug rehabs operate in the evenings and weekends or unofficial hours. This means that patients can maintain their lifestyle such as employment, school, family, and other essential parts of their lives while receiving drug and alcohol addiction treatment.

This is especially important if the patient is the head of the family or the breadwinner. It means that they can go on with family care and providing as they undergo treatment.

Outpatient Drug Rehabilitation Programs Offer More Freedom

If you wish to get help for a drug or alcohol addiction—one that has not yet reached a point of crisis—you may feel an outpatient treatment is better suited to you. By being an outpatient, you can still return home every evening and do so discreetly.

If you have a stronger personal support system at home, you may feel like an outpatient drug rehab program is a more convenient and realistic approach. Because you feel less limited, you can express yourself more easily and feel more comfortable about the process.

Just make sure that your family members or loved ones are on the same page as you and that they are also committed to helping you meet your goals of recovery.

Outpatient Drug Recovery Is More Hands-On

Are you someone who wants to directly apply what you learn in therapy to your everyday life? If so, you will like the programs offered at an outpatient facility. By taking this approach, you can prevent the triggers that lead to addiction.

Counseling sessions give you the information you need to improve your coping skills so you can deal with everyday stresses and anxieties more effectively.

When you choose to check into a treatment center, you will notice that there are a few options you can take. In particular, you have the options of inpatient and outpatient programs. Both programs have their benefits, and you will find that the best opportunity to take depends on you and your particular needs. Knowing the difference between the two programs is vital as each person's addiction is not the same as someone else's.

When you need to determine whether it's time to seek treatment for alcohol addiction, you will notice particular symptoms that you need to look out for. Recognizing them will help you understand that you need help and that you can't wait any longer. It would be best if you remember that the sooner you seek help, the sooner you can begin the process of healing properly.

Experiencing An Increased Tolerance

When you begin to drink, it is easy to get intoxicated. As you continue to drink over more extended periods, you will notice that it takes you longer to get to that place. That is one of the most significant indicators that you need help. When you've gone from one drink to twelve or more in a single night, you know that you can't continue this behavior any longer. Another symptom that ties into this is if you are experiencing a strong desire to drink every day and feel that you can't have a good day without one. If you find that your daily activities have become too hard without the help of some drink, you should strongly consider checking yourself into a rehab center to get help. Learn more signs to look for and steps to take.

Alcohol Addiction Treatment Is Needed When You Want to Confess

When we need help, it can be a difficult thing to admit. However, in many cases, you will find that you have a strong desire to tell someone and let them know what is occurring before the addiction gets worse. That is a strong indicator that you should look into alcohol addiction treatment and make yourself a plan. When you have a plan in place, the process is far less frightening. If you have confessed and have the support of those who love you, that creates less stress on you and ensures that you have a better experience in seeking help.
